Top 3 issues costing customers

1. Your reviews aren't doing the selling for you

What we found: Maki's review footprint is scattered and thin where it counts. Third-party aggregators checked October 2026 show modest numbers — 4.7 stars across 53 reviews (Birdeye, aggregated), 4.2 stars across 16 reviews (OutdoorNearMe), 4.81 across 31 (Experience.com), 4.5 (Superpages) — and a direct Google review count could not be verified from outside. Meanwhile a nearby competitor, The Tree Guy of Mt. Morris, shows a clean 5.0 with 31 Google reviews right in the search results.

Why it costs you: Tree work is high-trust and high-ticket. When a homeowner compares two companies side by side, the one with a deep bench of recent Google reviews gets the call. Good work that nobody reviews is invisible.

What fixing it looks like: A simple system — every finished job gets a text with a direct link to the Google review page. No begging, no awkwardness, just consistent asks. Reviews compound fast once the habit exists.

2. Your hours tell two different stories

What we found: The Google Business Profile lists Maki Tree Service as open Sunday 9:00 AM–5:00 PM, seven days a week (checked October 2026). The company website says Sunday: Closed — and lists different weekday hours (Mon–Thu 6am–7pm, Fri 6am–9pm) than Google's 9–5.

Why it costs you: A homeowner with a storm-damaged tree on a Sunday morning checks Google, sees "open," and calls — or checks the website, sees "closed," and calls the next company. Contradictory hours erode trust before the first conversation.

What fixing it looks like: Pick the real hours, then make Google, the website, and every directory say the same thing. Ten minutes of cleanup, permanent fix.

3. There's no social presence showing your work

What we found: No business Facebook page and no Instagram account for Maki's Tree Service could be found via search (checked October 2026). The only "Makis Service" on Facebook is an unrelated motorcycle shop in Greece.

Why it costs you: Tree work is visual — a 60-foot pine coming down cleanly sells the next job better than any paragraph. With no feed of recent work, there's nothing for a referred homeowner to browse, nothing to share, and no reason for past customers to remember the name when a neighbor asks.

What fixing it looks like: One Facebook business page, fed with phone photos from the crew after each job — before, during, after. That's the whole content strategy, and it runs itself once the habit is set.

Full snapshot
